beach points. Despite the obstacles, within hours Canadians were off the beach and starting their advance inland. The 6th Canadian Armored Regiment (1st Hussar) is the only one of ours June 6 that has crossed the Caen-Bayeux Highway over 15 miles (15 km) inland. By the end of the day, 15,000 Canadians had successfully landed, and the third Canadian division had infiltrated France further than any other country, even though it faced such strong resistance on the coast. The 21st Panzer Division launched the first counterattack between the beaches of Sword and Juno, and the Canadians faced several hard counterattacks in the 12th SS Panzer Division Hitlerjudyd on June 7 and 8. In Gold Beach, the casualties were also quite severe, partly because Sherman DD's reservoirs were delayed and the Germans strongly strengthened a village on the beach. However, the 50th Division overcame its difficulties and reached almost the outskirts of Bayeux by the end of the day. With the exception of the Canadians at Juno Beach, no division has come close to its 50th goal. The No.47 (RM) Commando was the last British commando to land and land on the gold coast of Le Hamel. Their task is to step inland then turn right (west) and make a 10-mile (16km) march through enemy territory to attack the coastal port of Port-en-Bessin from the back. This small port, on the edge of the British, is well protected in the chalk cliffs and is significant as it was a prime supply port, including fuel from an underwater pipe of tankers moored on the high seas. Omaha Beach was D-Day's bloodiest beach. Elements of the 1st Infantry Division of the United States and the 29th Infantry Division collided with the German 352nd Division, one of the best trained on the beach. Omaha is the most heavily fortified beach, and the pre-landing bombardment (by the Navy and Air Force) of the bunkers proved ineffective. In the eastern sector, 27 of the 32 DD tanks deployed did not reach the beach. On the western sector, DD landed directly on the beach, but suffered heavy losses due to the German 88 protecting the beach. Official documentation states that within 10 minutes of the ramps descent, the leading company became inert, leaderless and almost incapable of acting (most of all, every officer and NCO were killed or injured ...). It has become a struggle for and rescue. There were about 1,000 killed (and more than 3,000 victims in total), most in the first few hours. Commanders believed they were abandoning the coast, but small units, often forming ad hoc groups, eventually took to the beach and pressed inland. Pointe du Hoc's massive concrete puddle was the target of the US 2D Battalion Ranger. The task of the 225 men, led by Lieutenant Cole. Only 90 people survived the attack, which was repelled by Germans at the top of the cliffs, who bombarded them with grenades, bullets, even rocks and bottles. The weapons, which are not known to the Rangers, have already been moved to another location. The death toll on Utah Beach, the westernmost landing zone, was 197 out of about 23,000 landed, the lightest of any beach. The 4th U.S. Infantry Division was able to press relatively easily inland and was able to connect with parts of the airborne divisions that helped secure the beach and distract the enemy before landing.
